The Home Town

Henry Johnson, wife and four sons of Louisville, Kentucky, spent the Christmas holidays visiting Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Hillsman and family. Henry was reared in Giddings and lived here until he was sixteen years of age, moving then with his mother to Kentucky. He thoroughly enjoyed his visit to the old home town and says that Giddings is still the dearest spot on earth to him. While his business interests are elsewhere, he says that the old friends, the first friends, are the best, and that after you pass out into the world, commercialism displaces friendliness.

While here he looked up many of the old friends in Giddings and inquired of many others who had gone to other parts of the world. He visited the old city tank and many other familiar places and refreshed his memory with recollections of other days. He paid especial tribute to his Sunday School teacher and others who helped him get started off right in his younger days. He is today a prominent attorney and is in a position to pick his clients, which is one of the best recommendations among the members of the legal fraternity.
