

The Lincoln Barbecue

Last for the Season

The last barbecue for the season was given at Lincoln Wednesday. Although people were busy picking the fleecy staple, many came and enjoyed the day by partaking of some of the finest cooked barbecued beef and pork as could be prepared by the highest paid chef. Ample seats were provided under the spreading live oak trees and a gentle breeze was blowing the greater part of the time which made the day a pleasant one.

Music was furnished by the Friedrich band and numerous cool refreshments were dispensed. There were no special amusements, but every one was glad to meet old friends and spend the day in friendly association with others whom they had not seen for a while. Fifteen hundred pounds of meat was sold. The occasion was thoroughly enjoyed by the number in attendance.

This closed the barbecues for the season which has been one with a full program. Barbecues were plentiful because beeves were cheap, and but few communities have failed to give an entertainment. It has been a series of pleasant gatherings with many in attendance at each occasion, and the people feel the better for having mixed and mingled with their neighbors and those from a distance. Cotton picking is now in full blast, and but few social gatherings will take place until the "Northers" begin to blow and then "parties" and candy pullings will be in vogue. So it is good bye barbecues and hurry up, frost!
